

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

First and foremost I am indebted beyond measure to my colleague Philip Weller whose linguistic skills were invaluable during the writing of this book; I cannot thank him sufficiently. I will always be most grateful to my employer, the University of Nottingham, which provided financial support for my research trips to Cremona. The staff of the University's Hallward Library, in particular the Inter-Library Loans personnel (and especially Kenneth Robinson and Philip Bellamy), were unstinting in their efforts – almost always successful – to supply esoteric publications. I owe much to the international willingness of libraries to loan documents and historical publications, without which the research for this book would have quickly ground to a halt.

The staff of the Biblioteca Statale di Cremona were always happy to retrieve from their vaults the manuscripts of Count Cozio for yet further examination and photography, and I thank them fulsomely. Equally helpful was Professor Andrea Mosconi, of Cremona's Museo Stradivariano, who allowed me access to some of the Stradivari exhibits. Thanks also go to Antonia Natali-Stradivari, and her son, Luca, for their generous help with my Cremonese investigations, and to Laura Crippa for her researches in Milan. To Dr Jon Whiteley and Dr Colin Harrison, at the Ashmolean Museum in Oxford, I offer my thanks for allowing repeated hands-on access to the Messiah violin; both offered much advice and guidance and directed me to the Museum's archival material which underpins certain chapters of this book. Anne Houssay (Musée de la Musique, Paris) very kindly provided photographs and information without which some loose ends could not have been tied together, as did Elise Bâtnes in Norway. A particular expression of gratitude must go to Henri Grissino-Mayer, in America, who answered my endless questions about dendrochronology with good humour and in copious detail. My thanks also go to Kai Dase, Robert Cain, Steffen Nowak, and Stewart Pollens.

To my colleagues within the Department of Music at the University of Nottingham – particularly Sarah Hibberd and Mervyn Cooke – thank-you for all your support. Advice and encouragement was also offered by Professor Robin Stowell (Emeritus Professor, School of Music, University of Cardiff) and was gratefully received.

Finally, my thanks go to my wife, Marilyn, and our two children, Rebecca and Matthew, who helped in myriad ways (and possibly despaired of ever getting a sensible answer out of me, on any subject other than the Messiah violin, for four years).
